Radiographic assessment of the abutment region following immediate implant placement in the posterior maxilla: a clinical and radiographic follow-up study of seven cases. The aim of this study was to evaluate the effect of immediate implant placement on the marginal bone level around dental implants placed in the posterior maxilla and on the contour of the implant platform. A total of 24 implants were placed in six consecutive patients. In each patient, three implants were placed in a buccal position, two in a lingual position, one mesial to canine, and one distal to canine. During the first surgical procedure, four implants were placed in each quadrant, and the fixtures were submerged in the interdental soft tissue prior to healing abutments. The soft tissue was allowed to heal around the implants for 3 months. The second surgical intervention involved immediate implant placement into the healed hard tissues of the implants. Following the second surgical intervention, three implants were reevaluated radiographically using cone-beam computed tomography (CBCT) and scanning electron microscope (SEM). Bone loss occurred after 1.5 years in all the implants. Losses were concentrated in the 3 mm upper bone levels at the mesial and distal aspects, except for one implant. The 5.0-mm ridge width was partially maintained throughout the first 3 mm in all implants, but the 7.0-mm ridge width was not maintained. SEM analysis showed a more vascularized surface and irregular bone structure around the implant threads. For successful immediate implant therapy of the posterior maxilla, careful treatment planning is needed to avoid excessive loss of bone.

up shit / I push him down?" "I fuck him up!" "Sometimes we'd even pull my hair till it bled." "Baby, I miss your pretty face." "So how many times you want to do it?" "I'm an idiot." "Jules, I didn't leave because of that." "I left because of him." "Baby, I'm an idiot!" "You know me!" "I love that you're so critical, but you're blind to how you fuck me up." "Okay, Jules." "Please, just stop." "I don't know what you want from me." "I left." "I left because I love you and I left because I love you." "I left because I love you and I can't watch you turn
